

Gentrification and Anarcho-capitalism.

We are proceeding to the late stage of capitalism. As we know, everything in capitalism is surrounded by a hierarchical system dependent on wealthness and measured by wealthness. In my view, the hierarchy wasn't going away in our history, but it appeared in another form, and was very good at hiding themselves behind the relationship of money and states, which is the true dominant power. Especially, under the mainstream culture that everyone is distracted by #.

In recent decades, plenty of new apartment buildings have been set up around every major city. Painted nicely and colorfully on the surface and replaced the old houses and communities, which led to homelessness massively increasing in these areas. These “affordable” housing has brought thousands and millions people around the world with their American dream (which is kind of crunchy right now) into the city, but removed the native locals out of their life (Just like what they did centuries ago). From this tragic loop, one of the meritocracy rules we could find out is that in a hierarchical system based on capitalism, selecting the upper class and elites around the world can definitely create more potential wealthness than local people. (Which is why these days the mainstream media only talks about diversity but never talks about class.)

Capitalism will abandon anyone when it has to, Americans are not exceptional. I'm pointing this out is not because I am against immigrants. But we have to realize that capitalism is consuming people, no matter where you are from and what identity you have. Which is why the working class, the proletariats around the world must unite together before our capital elite united. And telling them, telling the big bosses this world belongs to the working class.

This world belongs to you, and belongs to us.

And eventually we are going to hand it to the one we love.
